Not illustrated. 1810 Excerpt: . . . take this opportunity of observing that precision seems to require the ascription of adjectives, denoting a specific rather than art indefinite relation, to every substanti e noun in which the imputed attribute may be supposed to exist virtually, and therefore, the words (KfeUjlt or s)yi y, , form, in my opinion, a better translation eta Just frir. ee, than jjj JS3l or, -lt JZ o. L. In th Leaving the learner to discover the proper application of compound adjectives in the only way which 1 conceive to be practicable, namely, by his own observations I shall therefore endeavour to account for certain consequences, resulting from that specific relation, which almost every jimplc, as well as many compound adjeElives, whether Arabic or Persian, will be found to denote. The Consequences to which I allude are, first, the common use or adjectives in the place of substantive nouns; dr, in other words, the frequent omission of the substantive, which should accompany every adjective, in order to complete the construction of a sentence; and, secondly the promiscuous classification of adjectives and epithets, under the general term, IJL or attributes; a classification by which the distinction between a substantive and an adjetlive, as it exists in our language, is entirely lost. The necessary or optional omission of the substantive, which should accompany every adjective noun, cannot possibly be authorized by the principles of General Grammar; because, on the contrary, its insertion muss be invariably necessary, in order to complete the...
