Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: .they are placed in great pans or kettles which revolve by means of electric power. Warm syrup--white or brown, or pink, etc.--is poured over, and as the pills are rolled over and over they take the sugary coat which helps to protect the medicine within from deterioration, and also to disguise the nauseous drug. The process used in counting pills is always of interest and mechanical methods have been devised which are far more accurate than any human counting. Trays are used, each of which has 1,000 shallow depressions into which the pills fall. The surplus pills are poured off and in a few moments a thousand pills have been counted. These are weighed on fine metric scales. The weight of the entire lot of pills is also obtained and the results of the counting and weighing compared. The scales used are so finely adjusted that long experiment shows that by such a process a million pills can be accurately and evenly divided. A sample is then sent to the control department with the formula card which must contain the signatures or vouchers of all concerned in the process, stating that the requirements have been carried out to the minutest detail. The pills are then ready for bottling. Thus when a nurse administers such a medicine she may rest assured that every ingredient used in making the pill has been tested either by chemical tests or on animals, and every step in the process has been...
