For this department of work a fairly large image of the Sun is needed, and therefore a telescope of somewhat long focus is required to throw an image of the Sun upon the slit. When simply the general spectrum of the Sun s surface is to be examined, it is often sufficient to point the spectroscope towards the Sun without attaching it to any telescope at all, or it may even be turned towards a bright cloud or the sky. So used, the spectroscope is often spoken of as an integrating spectroscope; but when a definite image of the source of light is formed upon the slit, so that the special features of the spectrum of any particular portion of the light can be distinguished, it is said to be an analyzing spectroscope; the spectroscope remaining the same in the two cases, but the mode of its employment being altered. The first details of the solar surface to be separately examined were the spots. The general appearance presented by the spectra of the different parts of a spot is shown in Fig. 151. The left-hand figure shows the position of the slit on the spot. The centre one shows the portion of the spot covered by the slit, which is what an observer looking directly at the Sun through the slit would see. The portions AS,...
